Module 5: Defamation

TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>INTRODUCTION</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WHAT IS DEFAMATION?</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CRIMINAL DEFAMATION</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CIVIL DEFAMATION</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CAN A TRUE STATEMENT BE DEFAMATORY?</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THE RIGHT TO PROTECTION AGAINST ATTACKS ON REPUTATION</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WHAT IS THE RIGHT WAY TO DEAL WITH DEFAMATION?</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TYPES OF DEFAMATORY MATERIAL</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Opinion versus fact</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Humour</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Statements of others</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Remedies and penalties</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ALTERNATIVE CLAIMS</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SLAPP suits</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Insult laws</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abuse of process</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CONCLUSION</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
MODULE 5

DEFAMATION

• Defamation claims are frequently used to stifle dissent. However, it can provide a genuine remedy for those harmed by the statements or actions of others.

• Criminal defamation is generally considered to be disproportionate in terms of international law. Civil defamation is often punished too harshly, rather than righting the wrong that was committed.

• Truth is a core defence against defamation claims.

• Some types of speech are excluded from defamation laws, such as opinion and satire.

• The growth of SLAPP\(^1\) suits by corporate actors using defamation laws to silence or intimidate critics is a concerning contemporary development that needs to be challenged.

INTRODUCTION

Defamation claims are increasingly used to stifle freedom of expression and dissent, particularly of journalists. While defamation laws aim to provide individuals with a remedy for public statements that may harm their reputation or honour, they frequently come into conflict with the right to freedom of expression, which is enshrined in a number of international law instruments and national laws. Balancing the protection of fundamental rights with protecting individuals from harmful statements is central to the appropriateness or otherwise of defamation claims.

The impact of the internet, and particularly social media networks, has meant that it is easier than ever to publish content to a wide audience. As a result, defamation has become a commonly used defence against statements published online, whether justifiably so or not.

The ability to freely post information on social media and the internet without the same degree of thought and review as traditional media, combined with a lack of awareness about defamation laws and the fact that many countries lack clear legislative frameworks dealing with defamation in the online space, has led to an increase in online defamation cases and some ambiguity in how defamation applies in the online sphere.\(^2\)

\(^1\) Strategic Lawsuits Against Public Participation, see SLAPP suits below.

Dealing with online defamation cases is particularly challenging for many reasons, including that “the internet is not an easily identifiable body that is administered or regulated within the confines of strict internationally recognised parameters or boundaries.” The online environment can make it more difficult to identify or trace perpetrators, and victims may want to consider whether to pursue the perpetrator or the system operator, since some legal systems consider anyone who participates in distributing defamatory material equally liable. In addition, deciding the jurisdiction of the court to hear the matter can be difficult, as messages can be posted from all over the world, and the parties to a dispute may come from and be located in different jurisdictions, or the message may have been posted somewhere else entirely.

This module provides an overview of defamation laws in Africa, and how the courts have attempted to find the balance between various rights in recent jurisprudence, particularly in dealing with online defamation cases.

WHAT IS DEFAMATION?

Defamation is a false statement of fact that is harmful to someone’s reputation, and published “with fault,” meaning as a result of negligence or malice.

The law of defamation dates back to the Roman Empire, but while the penalties and costs attached to defamation today are not as serious as they once were, they can still have a notorious “chilling effect,” with prison sentences or massive compensation awards posing a serious risk to freedom of expression, journalistic freedom, and dissent in many countries.

The foundation for defamation in international law is article 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), which provides for protection against unlawful attacks on a person’s honour and reputation. Article 19(3) of the ICCPR also makes reference to the rights and reputation of others as a legitimate ground for limitation of the right to freedom of expression. Reputation is therefore the underlying basis in any claim of defamation, whether slander or libel.

---

3 Id at section 3.
4 Id at p 127.
5 For example, South African law, as seen in National Media Ltd and Others v Bogoshi, per note 22.
6 Electronic Frontier Foundation, ‘Online Defamation Law’ (accessible at https://www.eff.org/issues/bloggers/legal/liability/defamation#:~:text=Generally%2C%20defamation%20is%20a%20false%20statement%20of%20fact%2C%20and%20published%20with%20fault%2C%20meaning%20as%20a%20result%20of%20negligence%20or%20malice). Under some legal systems, most commonly English law jurisdictions such as Tanzania or Zambia, libel is the term used for a written defamation, while slander refers to spoken defamation.
Defamation can be an important legal remedy for those who genuinely need it, but it can also be a weapon to quash dissent. There are many real examples where defamation may provide an important defence, for example in the non-consensual distribution of intimate images, a growing trend in the online era that disproportionately affects women. In these cases, defamation may provide recourse to seek justice for the non-consensual sharing of images (NCII) or other personal attacks.

However, defamation is also frequently misused, particularly by states and powerful individuals and actors to stifle free speech, as well as by non-state actors in the context of Strategic Lawsuits Against Public Participation, also known as SLAPP suits.

Criminal Defamation

Historically, defamation was usually a criminal offence. While some countries still have the offence of criminal defamation on their statute books, it is widely opposed, most notably by the United Nations (UN) and the Africa Commission on Human and People’s Rights (ACHPR) who have both urged states to reconsider such laws. For instance, the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) General Comment No. 34 provides that: “States Parties should consider the decriminalisation of defamation and, in any case, the application of the criminal law should only be countenanced in the most serious of cases and imprisonment is never an appropriate penalty”. Moreover, Principle 22 of the African Commission on Human and People’s Rights’ (ACHPR) Declaration on Principles of Freedom of Expression and Access to Information in Africa calls on states to amend criminal defamation and libel laws in favour of civil sanctions that are necessary and proportionate. It further states that the imposition of custodial sentences for the offences of defamation and libel is a violation of the right to freedom of expression.

In a landmark decision handed down by the African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights (African Court) in 2013 in the matter of Konaté v Burkina Faso, it was held that imprisonment for defamation violates the right to freedom of expression, and that criminal defamation laws should only be used in restricted circumstances. Since the African Court’s decision, there have been important developments in domestic courts on the continent. For instance, in the 2016 case of Misa-Zimbabwe et al v Minister of Justice et al, the Constitutional Court of Zimbabwe declared the offence of criminal defamation unconstitutional and inconsistent with the right to freedom of expression as protected under the Zimbabwean Constitution. Most recently, in 2018 the Constitutional Court of Lesotho struck down the provisions of the Penal Code relating to criminal defamation in Peta v Minister of Law, Constitutional Affairs and Human Rights.

---

stating that they violated the right to freedom of expression as protected in the Lesotho Constitution. Sierra Leone also repealed its criminal defamation laws in 2020.13

Additionally, the ECOWAS Court has upheld that criminal defamation and libel laws should be repealed, as evidenced in the 2018 judgment in Federation of African Journalists and Others v The Gambia which “recognised that the criminal laws on libel, sedition and false news disproportionately interfere with the rights of Gambian journalists and directed that The Gambia “immediately repeal or amend” these laws in line with its obligations under international law.”14 Most recently, the ACHPR ruled that Rwanda’s criminal defamation laws violated freedom of expression and impeded development in democracies. It noted that such laws “constitute a serious interference with freedom of expression, impeding the public’s right to access information, and the role of the media as a watchdog, preventing journalists and media practitioners from practising their profession in good faith, without fear of censorship".15

Despite this, many countries retain criminal defamation laws, even where they have been declared unconstitutional and are clearly contrary to international law instruments. Some countries, such as Zambia,16 continue to apply criminal defamation laws with vigour, while others such as South Africa have pledged to get rid of them but thus far have failed to do so.17

CIVIL DEFAMATION

Despite widespread agreement that criminal punishment for defamation is no longer acceptable in a democratic society, there is nevertheless a need for some sort of remedy for those who believe that their reputation or honour has been unfairly harmed.

Therefore, many countries have domestic laws regarding civil claims for defamation, but these laws vary by jurisdiction. In some countries, such as Zambia, defamation laws date back to 15 ACHPR, Agnes Uwimana-Nkusi and Saidati Mukakibibi v Rwanda, 426/12 (16 April 2021) (accessible at: https://www.achpr.org/sessions/descions?id=293).

---

16 In 2012 Rwanda convicted a journalist of defaming the President, but in 2020 the African Commission of Human and People’s Rights found that it violated her right to freedom of expression and that Rwanda’s criminal defamation law violates article 9 of the African Charter. For more see here: https://www.mediadefence.org/news/african-commission-finds-rwandan-authorities-violated-journalists-right-to-freedom-of-expression/. In Zambia, the law on criminal defamation is contained in Sections 191-198 of the Penal Code (accessible here: https://www.ilo.org/dyn/natlex/docs/ELECTRONIC/66208/62114/F-489934566/ZMB66208.pdf), while there is a separate Defamation Act of 1953, Chapter 68, that covers civil defamation (accessible here: http://www.parliament.gov.zm/node/792).

the colonial era and are considered overly restrictive on freedom of speech by limiting criticism of leaders or by instituting disproportionately harsh sanctions.\textsuperscript{18}

If a person is able to prove a civil claim for defamation, and the person responsible for the statement or publication is not able to successfully raise a defence, the person who has suffered reputational harm is typically entitled to monetary compensation in the form of civil damages. While civil defamation claims may serve the intended purposes of restoring reputation or honour, there is still potential for them to be misused and cause a “chilling effect” on the full enjoyment and exercise of freedom of expression.

Defamation used against survivors of gender-based violence

The case of Shailja Patel in Kenya is instructive of how defamation has been used specifically as a tool to silence victims of gender-based violence. Patel, a renowned Kenyan poet, playwright, and activist, publicly accused a fellow writer, Tony Mochama, of sexual harassment at a writers’ workshop the two attended. Mochama sued for defamation, claiming the allegations were false and that Patel had a pre-existing grudge against him. In 2019, a judge found against Patel, ordered her to pay damages of more than $87,000, to apologise, and to never publish defamatory statements against Mochama again. The magistrate also castigated Patel for initially turning to social media for justice as she did not believe the justice system would treat her case fairly.\textsuperscript{19}

Online ‘naming and shaming’ has become a popular recourse for victims of gender-based violence in recent years, particularly in countries where there is little trust in the criminal justice system to fairly investigate their crimes, and in which women are frequently blamed, including by police and the courts, for supposedly enabling the crime. In some cases, public ‘registers’ have even been compiled of accused perpetrators with the aim of warning future potential victims and raising awareness about the pervasiveness of these crimes. Allegations such as these are generally considered defamatory, and the people who originate or distribute such statements may be held liable.

The best defence against such suits is if the accusations can be proven true and in the public interest to share. In civil cases, the standard of proof is generally lower than in criminal cases, only needing to prove truth ‘on the balance of probabilities’ rather than ‘beyond reasonable doubt.’ An additional defence is that of privilege: “statements made by someone who is under a moral or legal duty to make them or has an interest in making them to someone else who has an interest in hearing them or a duty to do so.” This would require making the argument that the criminal justice system cannot provide adequate

In a positive development in South Africa, the High Court in July 2022 defended the right of victims/survivors to speak about their experiences of violence. In the case of Segerman v Peterson, the victim/survivor had spoken about her rape with friends and family and had posted about it in a closed, private, and anonymous social media platform group in which she named her rapist as a way to warn others, and to seek healing, community, and support from others in the group. Although the posts were intended to remain private, someone in the group made them public on various social media platforms. The alleged perpetrator applied to the Magistrate’s Court for a protection order against the victim/survivor, arguing she was harassing him by speaking about him to others and identifying him as her rapist. The Magistrates Court granted the protection order, which stated that she was “not allowed to tell anyone, in any manner, that he had raped her.” On appeal at the High Court, the Court affirmed the right of women to freely speak about violence affecting them. The case of Akbar v. Ramani in India found similarly, with the Court stating that victims of sexual harassment “cannot be punished for raising their voices against abuse on the pretext of a criminal complaint of defamation, as the right to reputation cannot be protected at the cost of the right of life and dignity of woman as guaranteed in the Indian Constitution.”

CAN A TRUE STATEMENT BE DEFAMATORY?

In most jurisdictions, truth is a defence to defamation claims, provided it can be proven. However, in some jurisdictions, truth alone is not sufficient: it is further required that the public interest in the publication be established as well.

From a continental perspective, the ACHPR states in the Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression and Access to Information in Africa that “[n]o one shall be found liable for true statements, expressions of opinions or statements which are reasonable to make in the circumstances.”

---

Courts in some jurisdictions, notably South Africa, have even found that false statements may still not constitute defamation. In National Media Ltd and Others v Bogoshi, the court developed the defence of reasonable publication, finding that:

“(T)he publication in the press of false defamatory allegations of fact will not be regarded as unlawful if, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, it is found to have been reasonable to publish the particular facts in the particular way and at the particular time.”

The term “reasonable publication” encompasses the idea that the author took reasonable steps to ensure the accuracy of the content of the publication, and also that the publication was on a matter of public interest. In Trustco Group International Ltd and Others v Shikongo, the Namibian Supreme Court found that “[t]he defence of reasonable publication holds those publishing defamatory statements accountable while not preventing them from publishing statements that are in the public interest.”

Similarly, General Comment No. 34 states that “a public interest in the subject matter of the criticism should be recognised as a defence against defamation.

THE RIGHT TO PROTECTION AGAINST ATTACKS ON REPUTATION

The right to protection against attacks on reputation is firmly established in international law. Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that: “No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.” This is echoed in identical words in article 17 of the ICCPR.

However, as indicated, a balance often needs to be found against offending statements which constitute an attack on a person’s reputation and the justifiable limitations on the right to freedom of expression and any associated rights.

WHAT IS THE RIGHT WAY TO DEAL WITH DEFAMATION?

When a person is found to have been defamed, they are entitled to a remedy. However, the remedies imposed are often punitive and disproportionate. We have already seen that sentences of imprisonment for criminal defamation are widely regarded as disproportionate due to their impact on freedom of expression. Likewise, heavy fines, whether in criminal or civil cases, are aimed at punishing the defamer rather than redressing the wrong to the defamed.\(^{29}\)
Module 5: Defamation

Whenever possible, redress in defamation cases should be non-pecuniary (non-financial) and aimed directly at remedying the wrong caused by the defamatory statement, such as through publishing an apology or correction.

Monetary awards — the payment of damages — should only be considered when other less intrusive means are insufficient to redress the harm caused. Compensation for harm caused (pecuniary damages) should be based on evidence quantifying the harm and demonstrating a causal relationship with the alleged defamatory statement.

---

Defamation on new media platforms

The growth of new media, including social media, in recent years has raised questions about whether existing civil defamation laws are adequate for the times and these new technologies. The 2019 judgment of the High Court of South Africa in Manuel v Economic Freedom Fighters and Others\(^ {30}\) provides insight into how courts may use existing defamation laws to deal with cases involving statements in online publications. The Court’s judgment contained a number of novel findings:\(^ {31}\)

- Because it centred on a statement posted on Twitter, the Court explained that “[t]he hypothetical ordinary reader must be taken to be a reasonable representative of Twitter users who follow the EFF and Mr Malema and share his interest in politics and current affairs”. The EFF is a controversial South African far-left political party, of which Mr Malema is the President and “Commander-in-Chief”. Both parties have been repeatedly accused of using language that incites violence, particularly of a racial form, in their efforts to achieve ‘radical transformation’ of society and the economy.
- The Court referred to the ‘repetition rule,’ whereby persons who repeat a defamatory allegation made by another “are treated as if they made the allegation themselves, even if they attempt to distance themselves from the allegation.” This has implications for others who play a role in disseminating defamatory statements further, such as by ‘retweeting.’ The Court did not explicitly address this point further.
- The Court also stated that the reasonable publication defence is applicable beyond just the media to ordinary members of the public too, provided they take all reasonable steps to verify the information as normally required under that defence.
- Although the judgment ordered the defendants to remove the impugned statement from their media platforms within 24 hours, the deletion of a tweet on Twitter does not necessarily remove it from all platforms, as there are other ways in which the content may have been distributed not addressed by the deletion (such as retweets in which persons added a comment of their own). This is a particular challenge that social media platforms pose when seeking to find an effective remedy to a claim of defamation.

---

\(^ {29}\) African Court, above at n 10.

On appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal in November 2020, the Court confirmed that the EFF had unlawfully defamed Manuel and granted Manuel declaratory and interdictory relief. However, it referred the issue of a damages award for oral hearing because the amount was “extraordinarily high.” The damages award was referred back to the High Court for reconsideration, while the Constitutional Court subsequently dismissed Manuel’s appeal to reinstate it, demonstrating the Court’s hesitance to impose high pecuniary damages for defamation cases in order not to stifle freedom of expression.32

TYPES OF DEFAMATORY MATERIAL

Opinion versus fact

We have dealt above with factual statements that may be defamatory. However, expressions of opinion are differentiated from factual statements. General Comment No. 34 states that defamation laws, particularly penal defamation laws, “should not be applied with regard to those forms of expression that are not, of their nature, subject to verification,”33 such as opinions and value judgments. It also notes that “[a]ll forms of opinion are protected, including opinions of a political, scientific, historic, moral or religious nature.”

To determine what counts as opinion, courts tend to look at whether a reasonable reader or listener would understand the statement as asserting a statement of verifiable fact, which is capable of being proven true or false. In the context of social media, a reasonable reader tends to be defined as someone who would ordinarily be following and reading the content of the person who has made the allegedly defamatory statement (per the example of Manuel v Economic Freedom Fighters above). The context in which the statement was made is critical to determine whether a reasonable reader or listener would understand it as opinion or as a statement of fact. There are, for example, ways in which a statement of fact may be made to appear as opinion.34 In 2020, a US District Court dismissed a slander lawsuit filed against controversial Fox News talk show host Tucker Carlson, citing the fact that the ”general tenor” of the show should then inform a viewer that [Carlson] is not ‘stating actual facts’ about the topics he discusses and is instead engaging in ‘exaggeration’ and ‘non-literal commentary.’”35

Humour

Similarly, content that a reasonable reader or listener would identify as humour or satire, and not reasonably interpret as stating fact, is also not liable for defamation.

---

33 UNHRC above at n 9 at p 12.
34 Electronic Frontier Foundation above at n 6.
Module 5: Defamation

A prime example is that of the South African cartoonist Jonathan “Zapiro” Shapiro, who was sued for defamation by former South African President Jacob Zuma for a cartoon in which he depicted the former President, who was previously charged with rape and accused of undermining the justice system to avoid charges of corruption, preparing to sexually assault a symbolic Lady Justice. Right before the case was to be heard, Zuma withdrew his suit, which Shapiro hailed as “an important signal that the president respects the right of the media to criticise his conduct.”

In an amusing recent example, American satirical news publication The Onion submitted an amicus curiae brief to the United States Supreme Court in a case brought by a man who was arrested for mocking local police using satire. The brief blends legal arguments with humour and satire to argue for protecting the publication of parody and satire as an ancient and valuable art form and to prevent the imprisonment of humourists.

Statements of others

A point of consideration, particularly for journalists, is the extent to which they are liable for the potentially defamatory statements of others, since a central part of their work is reporting on the words of others. The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has found that a journalist is not automatically liable for the opinions stated by others, and is not required to “systematically and formally” distance themselves from “the content of a statement that might defame or harm a third party,” provided they have not repeated potentially defamatory statements as their own, endorsed, or clearly agreed with them. The ruling of the High Court of South Africa in Manuel v Economic Freedom Fighters and Others raises some questions about the extent to which this principle holds up in African courts, particularly in the online domain.

Privileged statements

Privileged statements refer to those made in the public interest. Statements that are reported from the legislature or judicial proceedings are usually considered absolutely privileged, meaning that neither the author of the statement nor the media reporting it are liable for defamation. Some other types of statements reported from public meetings, documents and other material in the public domain may also enjoy qualified privilege.

Whose burden of proof?

A general principle of law is that the burden of proof lies with the claimant — the person who brings the suit or makes the “claim”. However, with defamation, this principle is generally

---

38 European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 1131/05 (2007).
39 High Court of South Africa above at n 32.
reversed, and the responsibility lies with the defendant — the person who made the allegedly defamatory statement — to prove that the statement did not damage the claimant’s reputation, either because it is true or for one of the other reasons listed above. The United States is a prominent exception to this rule, wherein the burden of proof in cases brought by any public figure falls on the claimant.

Remedies and penalties

As discussed above, criminal penalties have been the focus of much attention by international bodies, to the fear of many journalists. However, it is notable that no international human rights court has ever upheld a custodial sentence on a journalist for a ‘regular’ defamation case. In Konaté v Burkina Faso, the African Court held that:

“Apart from serious and very exceptional circumstances for example, incitement to international crimes, public incitement to hatred, discrimination or violence or threats against a person or a group of people, because of specific criteria such as race, colour, religion or nationality, the Court is of the view that violations of laws on freedom of speech and the press cannot be sanctioned by custodial sentences.”

It is important that civil defamation laws contain sufficient checks and balances to prevent them being used to unduly stifle freedom of expression, such as limits on financial penalties. Even in Ghana, the first African country to decriminalise defamation, “there has been an increase in civil suits for libel brought by powerful individuals, leading, in some cases, to damages payouts of such large proportions to powerful individuals as to threaten the existence of some media outlets.”

ALTERNATIVE CLAIMS

SLAPP suits

Alternative methods are also used to silence critics and journalists. One such example is strategic lawsuits against public participation (SLAPP), which aim to intentionally bury critics under expensive and often baseless legal claims in order to intimidate and silence them. Usually, the objective in these cases is not a positive judgment, but rather to leverage the threat of financial damage. Libel and slander are often used as the underlying complaints in SLAPP suits.

In the ground-breaking case of Mineral Sands Resources v Reddell, the High Court of South Africa recognised a SLAPP defence for the first time. The case involved a mining company that had been seeking to develop a project in an environmentally protected region of South Africa, and which had sued environmental activists who criticised the project publicly for defamation for an amount of approximately R14 million (equivalent to roughly $1 million). The court ruled that the mining company was seeking “exorbitant amounts for damages” which the defendants could not afford; that it was “evident that the strategy adopted” by the company was that “the more vocal and critical the activist is … the higher the damages amount claimed.” The court also stated that because the company “would be satisfied to dispose of the matter on the basis of a public apology,” it was clear that the action was not aimed at obtaining monetary or financial damages but rather at “vindicating a right” or for some other purpose. In a subsequent appeal to the Constitutional Court of South Africa, it was held that the SLAPP defence constitutes a form of the existing abuse of process doctrine under common law and did not require a development of the common law to be recognised as a defence under South African law.

---

40 African Court above at n 10.

Concerningly, contemporary SLAPP suits now often target the lawyers representing defendants. In South Africa, a mining company Atha-Africa Ventures (Pty) Ltd, recently filed heads of argument suggesting that the public interest lawyers representing the claimants in the matter, the Centre for Environmental Rights, were inherently conflicted because their organisation aligns with the cause of the claimants, in this instance a clean and safe environment. This new tactic, which finds no reference in previous precedent or case law, appears to be an attempt to intimidate not only the claimants but their lawyers as well.

A growing number of states, such as Canada, have adopted anti-SLAPP legislation to ensure the protection of freedom of expression, which enables cases to be heard quickly and may allow defendants to reclaim costs from the claimant. However, such laws must also be carefully constructed so as not to impede the right of access to justice.

Online harassment as an alternative method of suppressing dissent

Online harassment of journalists using non-legal means is another too-often used method of stifling freedom of expression and dissent in Africa, and one that has a particularly gendered nature. The case of Karima Brown in South Africa is instructive in this regard. Brown, a journalist and talk-show host, received countless death and rape threats on social media after Economic Freedom Fighters (EFF) leader Julius Malema posted her phone number online (known as doxing) in retaliation for what he believed was an attempt by Brown to surveil the EFF.

In its ruling, the High Court of South Africa ruled that Malema had breached the Electoral Commission Act that protects journalists from facing any harassment, intimidation, threats by political parties. In particular, the judge ruled that the EFF had failed to “instruct and take reasonable steps to ensure that their supporters do not harass, intimidate, threaten or abuse journalists and especially women."

---

42 Mineral Sands Resources (Pty) Ltd and Another v Reddell and Others; Mineral Commodities Limited and Another v Dlamini and Another; Mineral Commodities Limited and Another v Clarke, Western Cape High Court of South Africa (2021) (accessible at: http://www.saflii.org/za/cases/ZAWCHC/2021/22.html).

44 See Endangered Wildlife Trust & Another v Director General, Department of Water and Sanitation, High Court of South Africa, Pretoria, Case No. A155/19.

Insult laws

A number of other insult laws are still at play across the continent and continue to pose risks for journalists and others critical of government. For example, under the Lesotho Penal Code, the crime of scandalum magnatum (offences against the royal family) is created as a separate crime to defamation, and thus remains on the statute books despite criminal defamation recently being declared unconstitutional. Scandalum magnatum has still been used in recent years by the government of Lesotho against its detractors.

Likewise, the crime of sedition remains on the statute books in many countries and continues to be used to stifle freedom of expression. Sedition is commonly defined as the crime of “incitement of resistance to or insurrection against lawful authority.” The Nigerian Federal Court of Appeal has distinguished between an outmoded notion of the “sovereign,” who is protected by sedition laws, and the contemporary politician who is regularly subjected to a process of democratic accountability.

A more recent development has been the passing of ‘fake news’ laws in various countries. These laws are justified by states as being necessary to protect national security or public order and to deal with the misinformation pandemic that has been unleashed by the growth of the internet and social media but are frequently in tension with the right to freedom of expression.

Regional courts, including the African Court on Human and People’s Rights, have increasingly argued that public officials should enjoy less protection from criticism than others. Because of their status, access to the media, and power, public officials can often use their office to try to curtail freedom of expression and prosecute critics. Additional protections for those who criticise may therefore be warranted, to counter this imbalance of power. In addition, there is a real need for those serving in public office to be open to criticism and public input. As the European Court of found:

“The [politician] inevitably and knowingly lays himself open to close scrutiny of his every word and deed by both journalists and the public at large, and he must display a greater degree of...”

---

47 High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Case No. 14686/2019 (accessible at: http://www.saflii.org/za/cases/ZAGPJHC/2019/166.html).
tolerance, especially when he himself makes public statements that are susceptible of criticism." 52

The 2019 Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression and Access to Information in Africa also states, in Principle 21, that public figures should be required to tolerate a greater degree of criticism.

The Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) has called for the abolition of the offence of ‘defamation of the State,’ 53 and some jurisdictions have refused to allow elected and other public authorities to sue for defamation. 54 The ECtHR has limited such suits to situations which threaten public order, implying that governments cannot sue in defamation simply to protect their honour. 55

Abuse of process

Lastly, those seeking to silence critics and journalists may abuse court processes to meet their objectives. Recently in South Africa, a mining company, Tharisa Minerals (Pty) Ltd, filed for a protection order against two community activists. The mine ultimately withdrew the application which is largely reserved for victims and survivors of domestic abuse. 56

Practical steps on defamation

- If you have been a victim or survivor of the non-consensual distribution of intimate images, you may be able to use defamation as a remedy.
  - If you are able to show that the distribution of the images harmed your reputation, you may have success in a defamation case.
  - The challenge with using civil defamation as a remedy is that the images may technically be ‘true’, or even taken with the victim’s consent. However, if it can be shown that there existed an associated implication about the subject of the images (e.g. that reflect on their character) which can be proven false, a defamation claim is more likely to have success.

- If someone has posted slanderous comments about you online, and you are also a user of the same social media platform, you may have recourse with that social media company.

---

52 European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 11662/85 (1991), par. 59 (accessible at: https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-58044). For more on this topic, see the seminal case establishing the need for public officials to face a higher threshold of criticism, New York Times v Sullivan in the United States Supreme Court, 376 US 254 (1964) at paras 279-80 (accessible at: https://supreme.justia.com/cases/federal/us/376/254/).

53 OHCHR, Concluding Observations of the Human Rights Committee: Serbia and Montenegro, CCPR/CO/81/SEMO (12/08/2004), par. 22 (accessible at: https://www.refworld.org/docid/42ce6cfe4.html).

55 Ibid.

Module 5: Defamation

- Most social media companies have defamation reporting processes, which may enable you to have the comments taken down. However, they are unlikely to provide further recourse beyond removing the offending content.

- If you have been targeted by a SLAPP suit that uses defamation charges to silence or intimidate you:
  - Approach a reputable public interest law firm or human rights lawyers for assistance. Sometimes, lawyers may be able to act pro bono (free of charge) or rely on legal defence funds for their fees.

- If you live in a country that has defamation laws that infringe regional and international human rights, you may be able to do something about it:
  - Consider whether you have access to other regional or international human rights courts, such as the African Court of Human Rights, or regional courts such as the ECOWAS Community Court of Justice.
  - There may be jurisprudence in your country opposing the use of disproportionate penalties for defamation, but which have not yet been implemented by the judiciary or criminal justice system.

CONCLUSION

The criminalisation of defamation poses a serious risk to freedom of expression, particularly with the rise of new media platforms online. Defamation serves a real purpose to protect individuals from affronts to their dignity but is too often abused to instead silence and punish dissent. In a new trend, it is also being used to silence victims of gender-based violence and to institute SLAPP suits against critics of powerful private interests. Despite the recent trend towards the decriminalisation of defamation, there remains a need to ensure the implementation of judgments, to remove criminal punishments for other insult laws, and to institute legal protections against alternative methods of silencing activists such as SLAPP suits.

---

57 For Facebook, see here: https://www.facebook.com/help/contact/233704034440069. For Twitter, see here: https://help.twitter.com/forms/abusiveuser.